

ABSTRACT

A multi-chambered piston actuator incorporates partitioned pressure chambers, each chamber delivering an actuation force to a common target object based on multiple pressure signals and/or sources. The chambers are formed in part by one or more tiers, each tier having a surface area on which one or more pressure signals act. The resultant force on the tiers move the common target to control, for example, a valve.